By Jacquelyn Cafasso November 28, 2018SymptomsCausesDiagnosisTreatmentOutlookCat Eye Syndrome (CES), also known as Schmid-Fracarao syndrome, is a very rare genetic disorder that usually appears at birth. It gets its name from a distinctive eye pattern that occurs in about half of the affected individuals. CES can have a bug called koloboma, which leads to an ethnic pupil resembling a cat's eye. CES causes many other symptoms that vary in severity, including: heart failure tagsanal atresiakidney problems Some CES people have a very mild case and have few or no symptoms. Others may have a serious case and have different symptoms. The symptoms of CES are very varied. Ces individuals may have problems:eyesearskidneysheartreproductive organs in the intestineSect of these individuals only a few properties and symptoms can develop. For others, the symptoms are so mild that the syndrome may never be diagnosed. The most common properties of CES are: Ocular coloboma. This occurs when the crack in the lower part of the eye does not close during early development, which leads to a crack or opening. Severe coliboma can cause vision problems or blindness. Preauricular skin tags or pits. This is an ear defect that causes small skin growths (tags) or small deflection (bumps) in front of the ears. atresia. Then the channel will be gone. The surgery has to fix it. About two-fifths of CES symptoms have these three symptoms, called a classic triad of symptoms. However, every CES case is unique. Other symptoms of CES include: other eye abnormalities, such as strabismus (eye crossing) or one abnormally small eye (one-sided microphthalmia)small to narrow opening (anal hita) mild hearing loss with detailed heart defects, such as under-development of one or both kidneys, absence of kidneys or defects in the area produced by the extrarenal gna, such as under-development of the uterus (women), vaginal (female) or unwanted tests (male)intellectual injuries, which are usually mild skeletal defects such as scoliosis (curvature of the spine) , abnormal fusion of certain spinal bones (vertebrae fusions) or herniabilary atresia of certain toes (when bile ducts do not develop or develop abnormally)incomplete closure of the roof of the mouth)short stature abnormal facial features , such as downward oblique eyelid folds, largely isolated eyes and a small lower jaw CES is a genetic disorder that occurs when a person's facial disorder occurs when the biased eyelid folds, the largely isolated eyes and the small ces of the lower jaw are a genetic disorder that occurs when a person's are structures that carry our genetic information. They're found in the core of our cells. Humans have 23 paired chromosomes. Everyone has: a short arm marked p as a long arm, marked with the letter q area where the two arms connect, called centromere Normally people have two copies of chromosome 22, each with a short arm called 22q, CES people have two extra copies of the short arm and a small area of the long arm of chromosome 22 (22pter-22q11). This causes abnormal development in the stages of the embryo and the fetus. The exact cause of CES is unknown. Excess chromosomes are usually not inherited from the parent, but appear to arise randomly when the error occurs when reproductive cells divide. In these cases, parents have normal chromosomes. CES takes place in only one of the 50,000 to 150,000 live births, estimates the National Association for Rare Diseases. However, there are a few cases of CES recovered. If you have the disease, there is a high risk that you will pass on an extra chromosome to your children. Your doctor may first notice a congenital defect that may indicate CES before the baby is born with ultrasound. Ultrasound uses sound waves to produce fetal image. It can reveal certain defects specific to CES. If your doctor detects these properties in ultrasound, he or she may prescribe follow-up tests such as amniocentesis. During amniocentesis, your doctor will take a sample of amniocentes to analyze it. Doctors can diagnose ces chromosome material with extra chromosome material from chromosome 22q11. The diagnosis can be confirmed by genetic testing. This test may include:Karyotyping. This test produces an image of a person's chromosomes. Fluorescences on site hybridization (FISH). It can detect and locate a specific DNA sequence from the chromosom. Once CES is confirmed, your doctor is likely to perform further tests to detect any other abnormalities, such as heart or kidney problems. These tests may include:X-rays and other imaging test electrocardiography (ECG)echocardiography examinations cognitive functional tests CES treatment plan depends on the symptoms of the individual. Treatment may include a group: pediatric urgonsheart specialists (cardiologists)gastrointestinal specialists orthopedists for CES do not yet have a cure, so treatment targets each particular symptom. These may include:medication surgery to correct atresis, skeletal abnormalities, genital defects, hernias and other physical problems physical treatment for treatment hormone therapy for people with very short-stained special education for people with intellectual disabilities. It depends on the severity of the condition, especially if there are heart or kidney problems. Treating individual symptoms in these cases can prolong life. Some CESs have serious early childhood, which can lead to much shorter life expectancy. However, for most CES, life expectancy is generally not shortened. If you have CES and are going to get pregnant, you may want to talk to a genetic advisor about the risk of passing on the disease. Once the glue is set, take a fine tooth comb and comb the ears to form the plugs. You're going to get a lot of fluff, but there's still a lot left to make a nice ear. Once the ears have combed, there is a lot of fluff, like cotton balls. Take about 3/4 of the fluff and roll it into as tight balls as you can. This is going to be an ear filler. Put a small layer of glue in the wig cap inside a small ring made by wig hair. Attach the fluff ball to the glue and hold it in place until it stays in place. Brush the ear thread through to smooth it out and make sure it stands straight. Take a sturdy piece of yarn and tie it around the ear hair at least five times. It has to be safe. I tie back once, twist my back and tie my back, and then repeat several times. It's got a lot of knots, but it's very safe. You can cut the thread and hair above the knots now or wait after the glue. Take a clear glue and pour it into a bowl. Add a little water until the glue is watery. Take the brush and carefully paint the tied ears so that there is a hard coating on the ears. You can paint one or two layers, depending on how much time you want to spend on this step. If you haven't either, cut the threads and excess hair above the knots. After gluing the ears, I usually blow off the ears with a layer of hairspray, just for extra protection. We asked readers to send their favorite animal pictures. Living in a household with eight indoor cats requires buying large amounts of cat litter, which I usually get in 25-pound bags - 100 pounds at a time. After a week out of town, I decided to go to the supermarket to stock up. As my husband and I both pushed shopping trolleys, each with five large bags of litter, the man looked at our purchases and asked: Bengal or Siberian? One night, as I sat the cat in the inner part of my daughter's cat, it escaped outside. When it did not return the next morning, I found the beast clinging to a branch at an altitude of about 10 meters in a rotating tree. I didn't get it when I was tempted. I called the fire department. We won't do it again, the Women's Center said. When I persevered, he was polite but firm. A cat comes down when it's hungry enough. How would you know that? I asked him. Have you ever seen a cat skeleton in a tree? He said. Two hours later, the cat returned in search of breakfast. I worked on a flight in an asing kennel where people leave their dogs and cats while they holiday. One morning I had taken the cat out of her cage, and I played with her and replenished her food and water, put her back. A few minutes later, I was surprised to see the cat at my feet, because the cage doors automatically lock when they are closed. I couldn't figure out how the cat escaped until I leaned over to pick him up and spied on his autograph: Houdini. When my daughter and I only got one perch on our fishing trip – not even enough for a modest lunch – we decided to feed it to her two cats. He put our prey in their dish and watched as two spoiled pets sniffed the fish but refused to eat it. Thinking quickly, my daughter took a plate, walked to the electric road battery opener, drove it for a few seconds and then put the fish back down. The cats dug in. My father's secretary was visibly upset one morning when he arrived at the office and explained that his children's parrot had escaped from his cage and flown out of an open window. All encountered by a tame bird outside alone, he most concerned about what would happen if the bird started talking. Confused, my father asked me what a parrot could say. Well, she explained, she mostly says, 'Here, kitty, kitty.' – a customer recently brought her two cats to my husband's veterinary clinic for an annual checkup. One was a small-body, round tiger striped tabby, while the other was a tall, elegant black cat. He looked closely when I put everyone on the scale. They weigh the same weight, I told him. It proves it, he exclaimed. Black makes you look thinner. And the stripes make you look fat.
